

"See the money, wanna stay for your meal?"

A - Succinct Review of "Suits"

-RACHNA PATNAIK, XII-I

"Suits" is a captivating legal drama that delves into the world of high-stakes corporate law and portrays the fast-paced and cutthroat environment of a top New York law firm. As a 12th grader with aspirations to make myself a familiar name in the field of law, watching "Suits" was like giving myself a luring incentive to work hard and make it big. It provides insights into the internal complexities of the US legal world/albeit with some dramatic embellishments for entertainment purposes (Obviously, it's Netflix).

Let's be honest, a corporate law environment such as the one portrayed in Suits is as real as unicorns. Yet, I feel the show brilliant, even though a bit exaggeratedly, showcases the art of negotiation, legal manoeuvring, and the importance of quick thinking under pressure. As a budding law enthusiast, observing the characters navigate complex legal issues and outsmart opponents is inspirational.

Harvey Specter and Mike Ross, the dynamic duo are at the heart of the show, which essentially makes this gripping legal thriller what it is. Harvey Specter; the charismatic and confident senior partner at Pearson Specter Litt represents the epitome of success in corporate law. (Come to think of it, half the law aspirants post-2015 even started to think of pursuing law because of this guy.) Ross's character, is a genius without a formal degree in law and possesses almost double the knowledge in law that the average law degree holder could ever possess. When Harvey comes to know of this, and hires him into a firm which is famous for only employing Harvard Law graduates, it ties them in a bond where they both go to any lengths to protect each other. Ross's ways, although fraudulent; are representative of his dedication; intellect, and resourcefulness, Together, they form an unbeatable duo that excels in the tangled cases of corporate law.

Through mentor-mentee dynamics to workplace politics, it dives into the intricacies of work and personal relationships, showing how important trustworthiness, fidelity, and intellect are not just in profession but in life in general.